Why SSTA Training Makes Sense?

Being aware of safety procedures and expectations isn't enough anymore. Employers and employees must refocus on safety and work to be 100 percent accident-free. That's precisely why Southwest Safety Training Alliance Inc. (SSTA) was created in 1997. The purpose of the non-profit organization is to improve safety awareness and performance on construction jobsites. SSTA is made up of participating contractor users, general and specialized contractors; building trades/crafts organizations, and educational entities, all working together. They establish, maintain and provide standardized safety training and record keeping that is crucial to businesses that must keep safety at the forefront.

According to OSHA, "the responsibility for improving jobsite safety lies with employers." In Fact; "Where there exist joint-employer, multi-employer, owner-independent contractors and where partnerships have existed; the responsibility of managing safety belongs to owners, host employers and/or general contractors."

Advantages

There are numerous reasons standardized training pays off. A strong training course can improve overall safety performance and reduce strain on business resources, budgets and labor that is required to monitor workers on jobsites. In addition, standardized training taught by experienced instructors arms companies with an excellent risk management tool.

Other Benefits:

- SSTA provides workers with fundamental safety training as required by OSHA
- avoid redundant training costs, delays and complacency
- training costs shared by members
- a reduction in costs associated with Workers' Compensation and other insurance
- time and cost savings due to safer jobsites
- centralized records easily obtainable (online) for audit and review
- safety training completed before the start of the project
- standardized training industry-wide
- full use of existing craft facilities and trainers
- craftsperson's receive continual upgrades
